The trapping of millions of wild animal around the world entails immense suffering and death. They are caught in the wild with snares, leg hold and conibear traps and endure excruciating pain. Death can take days. In a desperate attempt to escape, many try to chew their limbs off. When the trapper returns, the animal will be shot or clubbed to death if they are still alive. Others die of infection or become prey to other animals. Snares, leghold and conibear traps are indiscriminate and often non-targeted animals are caught and deemed as "trash", even though they may be members of endangered species. Stop the cruelty. If you wear fur, always look for:
